The title of the international conference:

Puccini Forever!
The Maestro's Centennial Legacy in the Arts

I am truly grateful to the great audiences of New York for the enthusiastic reception given to my works. I accept your wishes for a safe journey and conclude by exclaiming: "America forever!"

With this passionate salute, a quote from the first act of "Madama Butterfly," Giacomo Puccini bid farewell to the American audience that had triumphantly welcomed him, as he set sail from New York in February, 1907. Puccini had traveled to America earlier that year, because the Metropolitan Opera was presenting "Manon Lescaut" and "Madama Butterfly," both performed by an exceptional tenor, Enrico Caruso. During his stay, Puccini conceived the idea for an opera set in the California Gold Rush, "La Fanciulla del West," inspired by David Belasco's "The Girl of the Golden West," who had written the drama Puccini used as the basis for "Madama Butterfly." The opera premiered at the Metropolitan in 1910.

Puccini's works reflected the influences of Italian opera composers, while incorporating new international narratives. His worldwide recognition grew following the success of "Manon Lescaut" (1893) and "La Bohème" (1896). Puccini was being praised for his unique ability to infuse emotion into his compositions, and this reached its peak with the political drama "Tosca" (1900) and the tragedy "Madama Butterfly" (1904). Later in his career, he explored exotic themes with "Turandot" (completed posthumously by Franco Alfano in 1926), demonstrating his interest in Persian influences. Puccini's operas are renowned for their melodic richness, dramatic intensity, and innovative use of orchestration.

In the centenary of Giacomo Puccini's death, the seventieth anniversary of the Puccini Festival in Torre del Lago, and the hundred and twentieth anniversary of the premiere of "Madama Butterfly," we plan to honor the Maestro by acknowledging his international legacy and reception by both American and Italian audiences.
